

It's time for Canada to stop destroying its families

By Eeva Sodhi, Justice reporter

It is telling that even the Archbishop of Canterbury can no longer silently watch the universal destruction of the family which is accomplished by reducing fathers to the status of bonded labourers and mere walking wallets to their children and former partners.

Adding insult to injury is the fact that these very same fathers whom the law, at the request of the mothers, allows to have only limited contact, or no contact at all, with their biological children, are free to co-habit with other women and their children who also may be prevented from having contact with their own fathers, who may reside with other children. Thus, children are made to interact and live with unrelated males, whether they want or not, though the contact with their biological parent is strictly regulated. The only determining factor is the mother's preference.

Studies support the argument that the most dangerous place for a child is in a home headed by a lone mother or where the mother cohabits with a partner who is unrelated to the child. Males of all species are genetically programmed to be the protectors and defenders of their families and children, whereas, as anthropologists argue, they tend to regard children who are sired by other men as a threat to the continuation of their bloodline.

History shows that this has been true since times immemorial, and that it continues to be so even today. We only need to watch the evening news in order to see the harrowed faces of fathers carrying the dead bodies of their children, and husbands carrying the bodies of their wives, in war torn countries. Men are, and have always been, prepared to sacrifice everything, including their own lives, in order to defend their families.

It is of grave concern that governments across the world, under the stewardship of the UN, are determined to continue to destroy the family, claiming that the unfathomable harm that their actions do to the children is done according to the "best interest of the child" dogma. Many of those who are guilty of this abomination are themselves fathers.

It is time to let sanity prevail. Families are the cornerstones of every nation. To destroy the family is to destroy the nation. To do this in order to appease a misguided and shrill voiced small special interest groups whose greed, malice and appetite for government funds know no bounds, is not what governments are elected to do.
